7. From a practical viewpoint, authors would do well to prepare two presentations: an "oral" presentation for use at the meeting, and a written paper for publication. These two presentations are not the same, one being in "oral" English, the other in "written" English.

The oral presentation should be interpretive and directed at stimulating the interest of the audience; it must be lively, animated, and devoid of too much technical detail. Reference should be made to the written paper for supporting data.
